Su Yang’s artistic research focuses on the representation of women in contemporary Chinese art. Her art practice focuses on discussing the female representation that reflects the changing standards of beauty. She wanted to reframe the representation of women in contemporary Chinese art instead of the male gaze of the “ideal” female beauty. Su Yang’s research and practice is about feminism and how the feminist art theory can affect domestic and overseas Chinese artists to represent women. As a woman artist, she wanted to reframe the female representation in contemporary Chinese art instead of continuing the “ideal” female beauty for male gaze.

After received her bachelor degree from Tsinghua University in 2010, Su Yang went to the US and received her master degree from the State University of New York at Buffalo in 2014. To further study feminist art theory and continue her research, she is currently doing her PhD research at the Victoria College of the Arts at the University of Melbourne.
